Greenland movie trailer gerard butler

STX just dropped a trailer, poster and a few pictures from Gerard Butler and Morena Baccarin's disaster film Greenland. The film is still scheduled for release in theaters April 14. The opening of Disney DIS Land was officially delayed until 17 May. If Mulan is delayed (or ends up at Disney+, which would mean Disney sacrifices hundreds of millions of dollars in potential global theater revenue) and Chris Nolan's Tenet escapes in late 2020 or sometime in 2021, Greenland could be (if it opens as scheduled), by default the only major theatrical release of the summer. The image concerns a father (Butler), a mother (Baccarin) and a son (Roger Dale Floyd) as they try to reach a possible sanctuary in Greenland, when the fragments of camel that kill the planet destroy and destroy around them. I don't have a budget for this, but STX acquired distribution rights in March 2019 for thunder road films production. Ric Roman Waugh's (surprisingly good) Angel Has Fallen looked much bigger in scale and scope than its $40 million budget (budgets of less than $60 million and $70 million London Has Fallen and Olympus Has Fallen) would suggest. So it's likely that this movie was significantly cheaper than Butler's $120 million Geostorm. Directed by Dean Devlin, the film earned only $33.7 million domestically in late 2017, but earned a globally nearly respectable $221.6 million. I imagine that anything close to that global character would be a big win for Chris Sparlin's Pen and Greenland directed by Ric Roman Waugh, although Butler is still a genuine movie star only in cases where the budget doesn't require blockbuster business. Geostorm was a $221.6 million bombshell, but Den of Thieves received a development series in early 2018 for $80.5 million worldwide. When you're not dealing with Gods of Egypt-level budgets, Butler is a true B-movie movie star. But if it's the only big movie to open in theaters this summer, Greenland is by default closest to the city's A+ tent bar. Gerard Butler is now focused on saving his family from comet. The Angel Has Fallen star meets this world's enemy in the Greenland trailer, angel director Ric Roman Waugh in a new disaster thriller. The excitement of the impending fly-by of a comet named Clark turns into fear and pandemonium as the fragments begin to waste earth. Hoping to avoid total extinction, John Garrity (Butler), his estranged wife Allison (Morena Baccarin) and their young son (Roger Dale Floyd) are desperately trying to seek refuge in the rumored safe haven. If we're talking about the basics of it, I just loved this idea of family. Butler says of the movie. It begins with a sense of almost simple family drama: the family struggles to get back together, the husband has just moved back into the house, the boy isn't sure what's going on, and you feel like it's going one way, but in the background something darker is developing. And then through their drama you are thrown into this much bigger, epic, overwhelming scenario that they can't control, and it becomes this battle for survival, but with family you are already grounded and caring. It becomes this road trip to save themselves, and also what they experience along the way and how the rest of humanity deals with this. But ultimately it feels like this journey to love and support and connectivity and understanding of what really matters in life. I thought it was a very powerful and inspiring message.
